Limits of cooperation

Reforms in cooperative sector should not be at the cost of federal principles

The cooperative movement certainly needs reform and revitalisation. Beset by political interference, (A)/ many cooperatives society (B)/do not hold elections regularly, (C)/ while some are superseded frequently (D). The 97th Constitution Amendment, which came into effect in 2012, was a major step towards infusing autonomy, democratic functioning and professional management. The recent Supreme Court verdict holding the amendment (A)/unconstitutional to the extent it applied to cooperative societies(B)/ under the control of the States is a reminder that even well-intention (C)/ efforts towards reforms cannot be at the cost of the quasi-federal principles underlying the Constitution (D).

The amendment added Part IXB to the Constitution, concerning cooperative societies. Part IXB delineated the contours of what State legislation on cooperative societies ought to contain, including provisions on the maximum number of directors in each society, reservation for seats for SCs, or STs, and women, besides the duration of the terms of elected members, among others. The question before the Court was whether the 97th Amendment impacted the legislative domain of the State Legislatures and, therefore, required ratification (A)/ by half the legislatures, (B)/ in addition to the required two-third (C)/ majority in Parliament (D). The Gujarat High Court had found the amendment invalid for want of such ratification. The Supreme Court, by a 2:1 majority, upheld the judgment holding the amendment invalid, but only in relation to cooperatives under the States. The elaborate amendment will (A)/ hold good for multi-State cooperative (B)/ societies, on which Parliament (C)/ was competent to enact laws(D).
