The debacle of demonetization

Five years later, it is clear that the policy was neither economically sound nor ethically grounded

ARTICLE

November 8, 2016, the Prime Minister announced that from midnight, ₹500 and ₹1,000 notes would no longer be legal tender. Though Indians were given the opportunity of redeeming the full value of their money held in this form, they could do so only by depositing the notes in a bank or Post Office savings account. The total value of the currency affected by this move, henceforth referred to as demonetisation, was 85%. A former U.S. Secretary of the Treasury said this was by far the "most sweeping change in currency policy that has occurred anywhere in the world in decades". With five years of experience, we are now in a position to give an unqualified verdict on the consequences of this move.

ARTICLE

The original argument given for demonetisation was that it would extinguish unaccounted or 'black' money. The presumption underlying this was that with unaccounted income inevitably held as cash, owners of these hoards would be hesitant to turn them in to banks as they would have to explain the source. When it was pointed out that unaccounted income is very likely to have been converted into assets or transferred overseas, government shifted the narrative. It then explained that the move was meant to get the economy to run on 'less cash'. Finally, it strongly asserted that the move would incentivise direct tax payment and this would raise the government's revenues sufficiently to allow for greater public investment and the provision of more public services.
