Earthquakes can (A) sperm whales' ability to hunt for up to a year, according to the first-ever study to look at the effects of the temblors on marine mammals. On November 14, 2016, the magnitude 7.8 Kaikoura earthquake struck New Zealand's South Island, causing a (B) tsunami, as well as two deaths and a few dozen injuries. Under the surface, the seismic event (C) strong currents that swept away and mostly killed off diverse ecosystems of invertebrates living along the Kaikoura underwater canyon. The massive landslide not only clouded the water but also flushed the animals hundreds of miles away, likely rearranging the makeup of the entire ecosystem. The (D) earthquakes have on land animals has been well documented, but scientists know relatively little about what happens underwater. Recent research on Caribbean sharks, for instance, has revealed that fish dive deep to escape roiling surface waters during hurricanes. Such research is important for government agencies, which may need to take recent earthquakes into (E) when considering fishing quotas.
