The significance of the Green Revolution

India has rich experience in this area, having engineered a Green Revolution in the 1960s, but it is not being tapped. At the time, reeling under extreme food shortage following two successive droughts, the government orchestrated a supply-side response by providing farmers with high-yielding seeds, cheap credit, and assured prices through procurement. This succeeded spectacularly. Within a few years India was no longer dependent on food imports.

If there was a single event that aided India's quest to be self-reliant in the highly polarised climate of the Cold War, it was this. Western economists have pointed to the success of the United States' mission to land a human on the moon as an example of an entrepreneurial state. However, to have engineered the Green Revolution in India at a time when it was a desperately poor country challenged by having to ensure food security to a staggeringly large number is perhaps more significant.

Men's tennis held up old order; women's section threw up Gauff

The axiom that there are limits to human ability often faces its stiffest resistance in elite sport. Novak Djokovic's men's record-extending 24th Major singles title might set him on a path towards immortality. The straight-set victory over Russia's Daniil Medvedev in the US Open final drew him level with Margaret Court's all-time record of 24 crowns and made him the first man to win three Slams in a single year four times. Two years ago in New York, Medvedev had stopped Djokovic from completing the Grand Slam, the onerous feat of winning all four Majors in a single year. Coming into Sunday, the 27-year-old was fresh off a terrific semifinal win over tournament-favourite and top seed Carlos Alcaraz. But even at the age of 36, Djokovic showed he still had space to evolve and grow, re-jigging his tactics by employing the serve-and-volley and mining every last reserve of his energy.
