The RBI has done right to give an ultimatum to Indian banks to report cyber-attacks immediately or face (1) action. This is in sync with global practices. In the US too, regulators are reportedly getting tough on lenders who they think are not doing enough to protect themselves, following the escalating attacks. Last year, the US Congress passed legislation that lets companies share real-time data on cyber threats with federal investigators without opening themselves up to customer lawsuits.

India should do the same. Not just banks, all companies should be mandated to report cyber-attacks. Often, banks and companies do not report hacking threats fearing it would impact their stock price. This can be (2) only when there is a legal requirement on reporting. To start with, companies can report to the Indian Computer Emergency Response Team. However, the need is to swiftly create a specialised agency to (3) and investigate cyber-attacks in a coordinated way, analyse patterns and take remedial measures. In 2015,

In 2015, the home ministry approved, in principle, setting up of an Indian Cyber Crime Coordination Centre (I-4C) for effective execution of online cyber-crime reporting, cyber-crime monitoring, setting up of forensic units, capacity building of police, prosecutors and judicial officials, promotion of R&D and awareness creation. However, progress on I-4C has been tardy. India is vulnerable to cyber attacks. The legal framework for privacy and data (4) is rudimentary. Enforcement is non-existent. With larger and larger areas of banking, commerce, compliance and reporting turning electronic, and linked to unique identifiers, cyber security becomes of paramount importance. Laws must (5), and so must compliance and enforcement.

Can an experiment (1), carried out, and reported in kids-speak with pencil-coloured figures and handwritten tables by school children aged 8 to 10 years get published in a highly rated international journal following a peer-reviewing process? Twenty-seven schoolchildren from the Blackawton Primary School in Devon, U.K., have proved this is possible — if a simple but novel scientific question raised is (2) in a scientific way. The objective was to test if bumblebees, once trained, could remember the visual pattern based on colour and choose the correct holes representing sugar water.

The bees were first trained using a grid containing 16 holes in a 4x4 array, with the inner four holes containing sugar water and set to blue and the outer 12 holes containing salt water and set to yellow, and vice versa. They were then tested using the same and also a new pattern of colours, and retested using a new colour. The finding was that bumble-bees can use a "combination of colour and spatial relationships in (3) which colour of flower to forage from." Considering that our understanding of how bees perceive coloured patterns and scenes is inadequate, this inspiring outcome has shown that schoolchildren guided by gifted teachers can think and carry out experiments like any hard-wired scientist. An accompanying commentary (“Blackawton bees: commentary on Blackawton, P.S. et al.” by Laurence T. Maloney and Natalie Hempel de Ibarra) notes that the experiments were “modest in scope but cleverly and correctly designed.”

For these kids, doing science changed their (4) of the subject. Science also became “cool and fun.” This refreshing approach turns the spotlight on the best methods of teaching science.

The rote learning system adopted by most schools in India, even classroom study combined with some laboratory work with predefined outcomes, does very little to stimulate (5) and interest in science. Is that one of the reasons why out-of-the-box thinking that produces path-breaking science rarely comes out of Indian laboratories? The children at Blackawton had their gifted teacher, and R. Beau Lotto, a neuroscientist and co-author from University College, London, to guide them. Scientists from India's space and atomic energy departments and in some other places where serious science is done can take a leaf out of Blackawton's book and lead the way in engaging with school pupils and getting them to do real science.
